New Girl in Town

For those of you that might be missing some good mysteries based in New Mexico since Tony Hillerman's passing, there are a few new authors out there trying to fill the gap. Stephen Havill's Heartshot was reviewed a few months back and Anne Hillerman is attempting to fill her father's shoes with tales continuing with the beloved characters of Chee and Leaphorn. Lonna Enox is new to the mystery genre and this is her first novel.

The Last Dance by Lonna Enox

Saddle Gap is a small, quiet, fictional town on the New Mexico-Mexico border. Sorrel James inherited an old homestead there and although it has been years since she has visited, she has chosen this spot to escape from some horrible memories of her past life. The house had doubled as a craft and gift shop. It had not been lived in or taken care of in years. Sorrel finds a bed and breakfast that will allow her cat, Flash, to stay until the home is livable. And so begins the process of renovating, job hunting, and gathering artists that may be willing to sell their crafts. Sorrel's interest is photography and she falls in love with the "Enchanted State".

Shortly after moving to Saddle Gap, in an attempt to meet some of the town's people, she enters a bar that doubles as a dance hall. She sits alone and people watches for a while and then returns to the bed and breakfast. The next morning, a sad and lonely looking woman that she remembers from the bar, is found murdered.

She finds employment with the local newspaper as a photojournalist and is called upon to do some forensic photo work for the local sheriff's department on a second homicide in this small town that rarely sees any criminal acts. She comes under suspicion for having arrived in the town the same time the murders occurred and being secretive about her past life. Lonna spins a good tale. You may even wonder if Sorrel might be the murderer or maybe the next victim.
