The Little Details

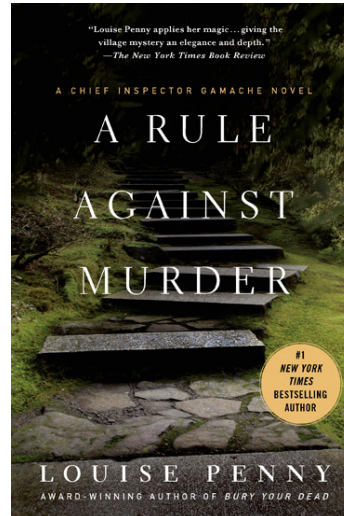

Mysteries and detective stories are certainly among the most popular of fiction genres, generally and in the Library's collection, as well. But it's not just the lure of the puzzle that may account for the popularity of a particular series, but an exotic setting like the Venice of Donna Leon's Inspector Brunetti, the Louisiana bayous of James Lee Burke's Dave Robicheaux or the French-Canadian haunts of Louise Penny's Inspector Gamache. The Library has several books in the Gamache series.

A Rule Against Murder by Louise Penny

In this fourth installment of the series, Inspector Armand Gamache and his lovely wife Reine-Marie have returned once again for their anniversary to the luxurious hotel Manoir Bellechasse in the Quebec countryside where they celebrated their honeymoon years ago. Unfortunately, the isolated grand auberge has also been chosen for the same time period by the wealthy, obnoxious Morrow family, who have been gathered by the widowed and remarried matriarch, Irene Finney, to dedicate a memorial to the father of their four quarrelsome offspring. The older son Thomas and his gluttonous wife, Sandra seem to delight in tormenting the next oldest child Julia, who has divorced her disgraced-financier husband when they are not trading insults with the other sister, Marianna, who is accompanied by her strange, reticent and intentionally androgynous child, Bean. It is a surprise to the Gamaches, after being snubbed by these eccentric fellow guests to discover that the last arriving family members are friends of theirs, Peter and Clare Morrow from the neighboring village of Three Pines.

The staff of the Manoir including long-time matre d' Pierre, chef extraordinaire Veronique, shy gardener Colleen, and the rebellious waiter Elliott, all show a professional face to the guests but have their own internecine problems. A kind of upstairs-downstairs dynamic develops as a violent summer storm -- literally and figuratively --approaches.

In due time the Morrows' monument to the paterfamilias is unveiled: a life-size marble statue of the man meant to stand in perpetuity in the Manoir's garden. But within a single evening the stone comes crashing down --right on top of one of the siblings. The investigation ensues. No one will be leaving this reunion until the Inspector has solved the mystery of this most unlikely death --and uncovered a few more secrets besides.

Woven through the narrative are wonderful descriptions of the Canadian countryside and the business of running an upscale auberge, not to mention the panoply of French cuisine on the menu at the grand hotel from the hors d'oeuvres to the after dinner cordials on the hotel patio. Such are the delights of mysteries set in foreign locales.
